THE IMPORTANCE OF MAKING A WILL

By Rabbi Ferdinand M. Isserman

Every individual no matter how well owes it to his family that he have an intelligently planned last will and testament. Particularly is it important that men of some means make proper wills, and that in these wills they provide for the institutions to which they are attached, so that by their deaths these be not handicapped. Generosity in making a will is not adequate. Generosity should be intelligently guided. A generous but unintelligent will may not profit a community. All men making wills should leave something to communal institutions. Torontonians would do well to remember the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, their synagogue, the Boys' and Girls' Clubs, the Talmud Torah, the local hospitals, the University, and some of the famous rabbinical schools like, the Hebrew Union College of Cincinnati, and the Jewish Theological Seminary of New York and the Yeshivah of New York. Prepare your will and prepare it intelligently.

WHERE PROPAGANDA MASQUERADES AS SCIENCE

Mr. J. B. S. Haldane, the distinguished British biologist and author in a public address in London on "Science and Ethics," stated that the greatest danger to which ethics is exposed from science lies in the "deliberate exploitation of scientific ideas in the interests of unscientific prejudices." Mr. Haldane referred specifically to the American quota restrictions, which are based on the theory of Nordic racial superiority, a theory which Mr. Haldane reiterates is without scientific justification.

Mr. Haldane refers to "unscientific prejudices." All prejudices are unscientific. They are opinions formed in disregard of fact. Who have advocated the theory of Nordic superiority but Nordics themselves? Why have they advocated it? To sustain their own bump of racial or national conceit. They have endeavoured to prove that the Nordics are the adventuring race, forgetting that Columbus, Magellan, Vespuccio, these greatest of adventurers were despised Latins. They have maintained that the Nordics are the conquering race, forgetting the military feats of Persians, of Egyptians, of Greeks, of Romans and in more modern times, of the French. The whole theory of Nordic superiority is nothing but the racial bravado of parvenu groups, who temporarily control the world. It is chauvinism, ashamed of itself and hiding behind the mask of science.

Boas and his school of anthropologists have proved time and again that the differences between individuals of any race are far more significant than differences between races, and furthermore that there are no superior or inferior races, though there are backward and advanced races. The so-called inferior races seem only inferior but are backward, and a change of their environment may make them advanced. History reveals many backward races who have become advanced. To the cultured Arabs, the Europeans seemed inferior. To the intellectual Greeks, the Romans. To the conquering Romans the ancestors of British, French and Germans.

LYON COHEN

We are happy to join the Montreal Jewish community in felicitating Lyon Cohen on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday.

Mr. Cohen belongs to the rare minority of American Jews whose springs of thought and action originate in the sources of Jewish life. He is a thoroughgoing Jew intimately bound up with all phases of Jewish activity. Possessing an unusual degree of intelligence he has been able to discern values in many outlying corners of Jewish life which are unnoticed by the average man of his financial and social situation. Hence the range and variety of his communal contacts. He is a religious, sabbath-observing Jew; a pillar of his synagogue; a staunch upholder of traditionalism. He is a "charitarian" and a leader in philanthropic endeavours. Withal he is alive to the nervous activity of the Jewish spirit among the masses; appreciative of the cultural significance of the stirring and seething and clashing of currents and movements among the progressive elements. He is equally at home among the gesticulating Yiddishists in Prince Arthur Hall as among the repressed nobility at the Montefiore Club. Mr. Cohen's handling of the chair at the Canadian Jewish Congress in 1919 was one concrete illustration of his breadth of sympathy with and understanding of the various shades of thought which obtain in the Jewish communal arena.

Mr. Cohen looms as an important figure in the transition period of Canadian Jewish history. During the early stages in particular the new settlers were engaged in throwing off all their impedimenta of old values; they were denuding themselves of their Jewish habits and traditions and modes of thinking the better (as they thought) to be able to take on the cultural offerings of the new environment. Jewish life was then at its barest; at its poorest; the old goods prodigally cast aside; the new still beyond reach. Lyon Cohen was an exponent of the dignity and value of the traditional Jewish thinking and living. He sought to implant a sense of permanence in the community and evolve an attitude of restraint and poise.

The new generation with new elements and forces at play, more at home among its environment, entering upon a period of creativeness, may require a new type of leadership; bolder, more daring. We do not see the new leadership on the horizon as yet. But so far as the older generation is concerned, there is no doubt that Mr. Cohen was its ablest representative and leader.

A JEWISH LECTURE

The other evening we attended a Jewish lecture which had many interesting and thought-provoking features.

Here was the setting: the hall located in a Jewish institutional building, in the Jewish district; the audience Jewish, for the most part Yiddish speaking; the speaker a Jewish gentleman with a fine Jewish beard; the language, a juicy, idiomatic Yiddish, with a considerable admixture of Hebrew words and phrases and biblical quotations.

The speaker, Dr. Steinberg, is a leader of one of the Russian socialist parties, at war with the present Bolshevik administration. For eight months he had been minister of justice under Lenin and

The Confederation Amusements, Limited, under whose banner "The Empress" theatre will be operated, announces that doors of said theatre will be thrown open to the public for general admission on Saturday, May 19, at 7 p.m. sharp.

"The Empress," which is situated at the corner of Sherbrooke Street West and Old Orchard, has a seating capacity of 1,800, and from an architectural viewpoint is a credit to the city of Montreal. The aim of this theatre will be to offer the very best obtainable in photoplays and vaudeville. The prices will be as follows:—Matinees, balcony, 15c.; orchestra, 20c.; Evenings, balcony, 25c.; orchestra, 35c.; Saturday evening, Sundays and holidays, 35c.

SPEAKING OF THE YIDDISH THEATRE

When, several weeks ago, I spoke of Molly Picon and her triumph in "Some Girl," writes Leonard Traube in the New York World," I penned the following:

"And if you will journey to Second Avenue and Second Street, where teeming humanity seeks diversion and pleasure as an escape from the humdrum of Ghetto life, you will become a full-fledged member of a gay world, a realm that for most of us miserable wretches is a fantasy—to be had only vicariously—in novels and whimsical tales of Lewis Carrolls and James Barries."

And now, in "Good Luck," the R.K.P. Society of Kessler's Second Avenue Theatre, known better as Rumshinsky, Kalich and Picon, triumvirate supreme, make good my early report and offer us a fantastic operetta of such gorgeous beauty and superb spectacle as would gladden the heart of any soul who thinks the stage is rotten and ever will be. And when, on a Friday night, I eased into my seat after missing the curtain, I was rewarded with a picturesque fantasy that was almost as thrilling as "A Midsummer Night's Dream," or a tale from the Arabian Nights, or something out of Wonderland, not to say as delightfully puzzling as a comedy of errors that some Bard of Avon once fashioned.

Joseph Lateiner, author of the text, is somewhat of an Owen Davis in point of fecundity. Well past seventy, he has done more than one hundred pieces. He achieved a place in the literary firmament with "Joseph and His Brethren," which was set to music by Abraham Goldfadden, father of the modern Yiddish drama. They tell me he is poor, even with his recent successes.

In the early days of the Yiddish Theatre, days when this reporter could be found spinning tops in any secluded alley, or getting the stuffings licked out of him by some bully bent on atrocity, Lateiner used to receive as low as $5 as royalty for every performance, and seldom more than $20. The R.K.P. Society appears to be more liberal. My investigations as president of the More-Wages-for-Authors-Club reveal that Mr. Lateiner is receiving $50 per performance, save matinees, which net him $25. By a mysterious system of rapid calculus I am able to determine his income up to and including May 13, when the doors of Kessler's close for the season. Next fall "Good Luck" will probably be incorporated into the regular repertoire.

And now of the R.K.P. Society: Joseph Rumshinsky wields the baton, creates the scores and is by way of being on the executive staff of the theatre. Mr. Rumshinsky's tunes are always inspiring and catchy, and filled with a lyric wit that is infectious. Sit through one of his musical shows and nothing can prevent you from humming the melodies in the subway, over your coffee and in the office. He represents the first letter of the distinguished society of R.K.P.

The middle letter is owned by Jacob Kalich, considered something of a wizard as regards staging, production and adaptation. Mr. Kalich is entitled, I think, to recognition as the master director of musical shows in the Yiddish Theatre. A short note from Mike Goldreyer, speaking for the management, can tell more of him. Thus:

"Plays are rewritten for Miss Picon by Jacob Kalich. Her husband knows just what she is capable of. Sometimes a play may come to his attention which appears to have dramatic possibilities. Ofttimes they come in half-baked and it remains for Kalich to put on the finishing touches. Sometimes he is called upon to rewrite an entire act."

The third of the famous trio is Miss Molly Picon, the little lady of laughter and loveliness. I can add nothing to her traits that I did not speak of once before, save the fact that she is possessed of a magnetic personality which she combines with a quaint simplicity that make for triumph.

If "Some Girl" was rich in song and dance, then "Good Luck" abounds in splendour and novelty; in workmanship, stagecraft and pageantry. If "Some Girl" was alive with silvery scenes, then "Good Luck" is magnificent in costumery, weave and imagination; execution, production and presentation.

What mostly I was thinking of when I saw it, indeed, what my playmate heard whispered in his ear was this: "Here is 'Alice in Wonderland' come to the Yiddish stage." Indeed, Molly (I take the liberty) does bring Carroll's Alice to Second Avenue. Even Aladdin and his wonderful lamp is brought to life by the magic touch of one Fatima, a character that represents a kind of Three Furies.

Miss Picon delights with impersonations of prominent characters on the Yiddish stage, something I am of the notion she introduced into the text herself. First she portrays the tragic Jennie Goldstein with nasal undertone, rather characteristic of that tragedienne. Then she shows us the highly dramatic Bertha Kalich and the tremorous-voiced Boris Thomashefsky. She continues with a clever characterization of that poor, forlorn, resigned individual—Ludwig Satz. Enter then the emotional, heavy and tense Leon Blank, veteran Yiddish thespian. But she brings down the house with an impersonation of our own Jimmy Walker, Prince of Palm Beach, pioneer of fashion and the present incumbent of the post of Mayor of the City of New York. She depicts the dapper charm, talking mannerisms and winsome smile of that guardian of Greater New York's destinies. In the hands of Miss Picon, Mr. James Jolly Walker becomes the sunny gentleman we know him to be. City Hall please copy. (I am just wondering how many citizens down at the City Hall understand Yiddish.)

No report of "Good Luck" would be complete without some lines about Mme. Regina Praeger, grand old prima donna of the Yiddish stage for a score of years. Mme. Praeger was classic when Molly Picon was doing long division and skipping rope. Years back, in "Shalamus," "Bar Cochba" (one of the star) and "The Gift of God" she was a goddess with a phenomenal throat. Her voice was then, as it is now, like of purest music and she brought a warmth into her singing that was matched by none in her time. She has lost little of that quality of tone that she possessed in years gone by.

Irving Grossman, the admirable tenor, appeared more to advantage than ever before, in the eyes of your humble observer. He was excellently cast, thanks to the society, as the doctor who falls in love with the cobbler's tender wife from across the street. Smart, wholesome and entertaining was Miss Lucy Levin, and Julius Nathanson, the scatterbrained barrister, was thoroughly provoking every time he echoed forth vehemently that the United States was being grossly insulted. His jargon was taken, presumably, from the cafeteria conversation of any law student in these several States. Boris Rosenthal as the brutal husband of the tender wife, Rose Greenfeld as the shrewish wife of the kind doctor and Frances Weintraub as the marionette maid were comic in their seriousness, particularly Mr. Rosenthal. A chorus of singing shoemakers, who, in violation of the tradition that the cobbler ought not go beyond his last, did so by rendering sermons and singing songs, rounded out the evening.

So I hereby stand up in defiance of all those who would refuse me uninterrupted passage down the aisles and onto the stage of Kessler's in one more heroic effort to throw my very badly worn hat into the ring once more for Molly Picon, the R.K.P. Society and the rest of the gang.

In ringing down the curtain upon this gibberish of mine, I should like to say that Mr. Stephen Rathbun of the "Sun" was among those present that Friday evening. He made mention that he did not notice any empty seats. Wrong, Watson, wrong. Two I saw on the balcony when, during the acts, I craned my neck, not disdainfully, to consider the populace encamped there in pleasant glory.

YE ZIONISTS, PLEASE!

Please, please fellow-American Zionists, do stop calling each other names! Your discussion in the press is not dignified! There are only six weeks left for the next annual convention of the Zionist Organization. You, who are pro- or con-"Lipsky administration," can wait for six weeks in silent meditation and then come to the convention prepared to reason the situation pertaining to American Zionism. Above everything else—do not become personal. Do not doubt each other's sincerity or honesty. And leaders of Zionism, remember the ancient injunction, "Ye wise men be heedful of your words!"

ADULT JEWISH EDUCATION

The most recent development in general education is the attention given to the adult. People in all walks have come to realize that education takes in "the whole life." Judaism has throughout its history emphasized education for the adult. Priest, prophet and sage tried to instruct the grown-ups. Study was made part of everyday religious life. The pious Jew devoted part of the morning or evening to study. Worship and study were part of a religious Jewish life. Ben Bag Bag's admonition, "Turn it—the Torah—and turn it over again; for everything is in it; and contemplate it, and wax grey and old over it, and stir not from it; for thou canst have no better rule than this," became a motto for every good Jew. In the old Jewish life there were numerous societies formed not only for benevolent objects, but also for Jewish intellectual self-improvement. There were Chevroth or groups for the special study of the Bible, of the Talmud, of the Zohar, or of Jewish Ethics. Even to this day, such societies are in existence in European lands. The great mistake of the American Synagogue is that it is no longer a house of study for the adult. It became "infantilized"—limited to child education only. Our grown-ups, whether they happen to be affiliated with Shul or Temple, must begin to realize that Judaism is a method of life and it is a life study. We ought to restore the Beth-Midrash in Synagogues and Temple. Then only will Judaism be understood even by Jews who know not the faith of their fathers; who are Jews only by accident of birth or out of sentiment. Then, perhaps, will Jewry restore real Jewish aristocracy—Torah!

PORTLAND—SYMBOL OF FELLOWSHIP

In Portland, Oregon, the Beth Israel Temple was recently dedicated. And the most striking factor in the dedicatory exercises was the presentation of a Fellowship Window by the Christian community. This window is inscribed with the words of the Prophet Malachi, "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us all?" Above the inscription there is a pair of clasped hands representing the idea of religious fellowship between the Christian and Jewish elements in the community. This window is indeed a symbol of ever-increasing rapprochment between Jew and non-Jew. To those Jews who doubt the sincerity of the good-will movement—we refer them to Portland and the Beth Israel Temple.

"A tub may be fine for you, Dad"

WHEN children return from university or school, often the first thing they miss is the shower bath to which school life has accustomed them. Says Son: "A tub is fine for you, Dad. But give me a shower every time."

Mayhap, Dad makes the mental reservation that he wouldn't mind an invigorating shower such as he enjoys so much at his club, if he could conveniently have one in his home.

He can have it. A Crane shower, installed over the tub or in a recess, makes possible to every member of the family the quick plunge under water hot, cold or tempered.

Crane showers and the latest types of other plumbing and heating fixtures, valves, and fittings may be seen at the Crane Exhibit Rooms. A visit will prove interesting and profitable. You will not be asked to buy, since Crane sells only through responsible plumbing contractors.

The Flying Litvak

By LOUIS BERG, in the Menorah Journal

Social note: Mr. Charles A. Levine, prominent business man of 150 Beach 135th Street, Belle Harbour, Rockaway Beach, well known in his community for his interest in Jewish charities, returned home after a six months' tour of Central Europe. He was greeted by fellow members of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, and a banquet was held in his honour. During his trip Mr. Levine visited many of the principal capitals, such as Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Paris, Rome and London. Mr. Levine made most of the journey by airplane.

Of course, there was more to it than that, Charles Levine being the same who with Clarence Chamberlin broke the transoceanic flight record by flying from New York to Eisleben, Germany, a distance of 3,825 miles. No mere business man of the Rockaways, however successful, can expect to hear sirens screaming deafeningly—at intervals—and tugs in the river tooting—every now and then—as his liner steams into New York harbour. Nor expect to find the official welcoming tug "Macom" waiting to transfer him to the Battery for a triumphal march to City Hall. True, the resplendent uniforms of the National Guard were missing; there was a lamentable shortage of ticker-tape streamers and telephone book confetti when the parade passed up lower Broadway; also it rained miserably, and the enthusiasm of the populace, for this or other reasons, seemed considerably dampened.

But otherwise the welcome accorded Mr. Charles Levine was not markedly different from those given the other victorious flyers. He was hailed from the steps of City Hall by the dapper Mayor of New York City, given an embossed set of resolutions, and his name was officially inscribed with those of Lindbergh, Byrd, Acosta, Maitland, and by this time too many others.

Yet how different is Mr. Levine from all these worthy heroes! How disconcertingly different!

But how else? These are veritable lions of the North. And Mr. Levine .... Mr. Levine, let us speak freely, is a Jew. More—to tell all!—not only a Jew, but a Litvak.

His father, Mr. Isaac Levine, was born on the Rudnitzky Gasse, in Vilna, from which city come all of the really precious Jews who do not come from Kovno. The elder Levine studied in the Katzina Cloiz. His father had the rabbinate in view, but Isaac rebelled, and fled to America, to open a junk business in North Adams, Mass. Isaac's father had been a pious Jew who travelled about in Lithuania exhibiting a model of Solomon's Temple. His grandfather was the learned and pious Rabbi Moishe Levine (a Yid a lamdan) who could discourse most eloquently upon the Talmud, and who spent his last days in Jerusalem, going there to die.

This is the lineage of Mr. Charles Levine. From his paternal great-grandfather he no doubt inherited a love for argument; from his grandfather, a desire for travel; from his father an obstinate and adventurous spirit and a shrewd eye for business. And from the land of his fathers—who would think otherwise who knows it and its sons?—that subtle virus in the blood which made him the prosaic-poetic, idealistic-realistic, ambitious, stubborn, quarrelsome, cantankerous, yet quite admirable sort of hero he is. Litvaks—everybody knows—are like that.

No wonder the Gentile press and public failed to understand. No wonder they were from the very beginning bewildered—and annoyed—by the unaccountable conduct of this new aviator-hero. In the annals of aviation there was simply no precedent for this mixture of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza which Lithuania and the tribe of Levine had contributed to the greater glory of God, the U.S.A., and [illegible] departs from the business of making money, he is apt to be as obnoxious as when he sticks to it.

To be sure, in the very beginning, Levine, as backer of the proposed Bertaud-Chamberlin flight, had cut no prepossessing figure. The war had made him a millionaire. The press had it that he had been a dealer in junk, although his father Isaac indignantly denied this allegation, insisting that Charlie dealt only in the newest of steel pipes and plumbing fixtures. He made his money by reclaiming shells and other munitions abandoned by the War Department; and although the Government shared in the profits, certain officials were so far from being satisfied with their distribution as to threaten suit against him for a sum ranging from $500,000 to $1,000,000.

No background, this, for a hero, for a modern Daedalus. Nor as a backer of the proposed aeronautical excursion to Paris did he behave according to American ideas of sportsmanship. He quarrelled with Bertaud, and he quarrelled with Bellanca, designer of the plane. There were constant bickerings and dissensions in the Levine camp, nor was the atmosphere improved when the young goy Lindbergh stole a march on the whole lot, and speeded across the Atlantic to a fame that has already endured seven months.

For regardless of where the fault lay in the quarrels between Levine and the ill-fated Lloyd Bertaud, which culminated in the resignation of the latter, the fact remains that the quarrel was over money, and the finger of suspicion was quick to point to the squat and none too heroic figure of the Jew. Comparisons were ready: the daring of the aviators on the one hand, the mercenary attitude of the man of business on the other. Clearly Levine's interest in aviation was the money to be made of it through the heroism of others.

For a frenzied week, Lindbergh, having arrived pajama-less in Paris, occupied nearly the entire front page of the newspapers and a good deal of the remaining space. Levine had been forgotten when the announcement appeared that Chamberlin was preparing the "Columbia" for another attempt to fly the Atlantic. The name of the flyer who was to take the place of Bertaud was not given.

Recall that solemn Viking Lindbergh gripping his friend's hand that misty dawn on Roosevelt Field. As he mounted his plane, he pronounced for an anxious world and posterity these portentous words: "When I climb into that cockpit, it's just like a man going into the death chamber. But when I land in Paris, it will be just like getting my pardon from the Governor." Then, with a swirl of the propeller, away the lone eagle flew, to glory and a world-wide acclaim.

Look now upon this picture. A small mob of skeptical reporters and photographers summoned for the steenth time to witness the take-off of a flight that somehow never materialized. The Bellanca and Chamberlin are finally going. Yes, they are. Like hell! Who's taking Bertaud's place? Into the empty seat in the cockpit quite casually stepped Levine. Just going for a trial spin, he told his wife and friends. Going on a record-shattering flight around Mineola, L.I., said the cynical reporters to each other. But the plane, after swerving, rather foolishly, to avoid running down a motorcycle cop who blundered into the path, lifted into the air, and to the consternation of newspaper reporters and photographers, friends, mechanics and curiosity seekers, winged straight ahead for Europe.

By a simple act of daring, Levine had completely dumfounded his calumniators, who were many. Dressed in the plain business suit he wore every day to office, Levine had set out to achieve the impossible. It was as if a rooster [illegible]

His wife behaved that morning as no hero's wife should; but then she had been given no time to rehearse her part. How was she to know her husband was a hero? She had married a cocky and self-assured business man, whom she had known from the time they went to high school together, and later when she went to work in his office as stenographer It is true they eloped to Baltimore to be married, but after that Levine had settled down to be a good husband and father, and, to say the least, an excellent provider. And now of a sudden he had turned eagle. Mrs. Levine shrieked and fainted.

Nor was the behaviour of Levine's father any better, if the news reports are to be credited. He showed an utter lack of sympathy for this latest crack-brained exploit of his son, who had always been hard to manage. For when Levine was a boy, we learn, he wished to become a jockey, and had been restrained with difficulty. Then, with quite unnecessary recklessness he had insisted on personally helping remove the powder from the shells abandoned by the Government. Later he had fancied being an aviator, and again his father had wrestled with him. This time Levine had consulted no one.

As a Yiddish paper reported him, the elder Levine was plainly annoyed. "Zu vos hot er es gedarft?" he is quoted as saying, and in this remark lies a complete Lithuanian-Jewish philosophy. "Now what did he have to do that for?"

Do it he did, however, to the confusion of a Christian world. He landed in Eisleben, Germany, some 46½ hours and 3,825 miles later. The press was not incoherent in his praise. For him no double-columned leaded editorials, later to be engraved on silver plaques. For him lifted eyebrows and little condescending paragraphs. Indeed, he was hailed rapturously only in a letter to the papers from a man who signed himself suspiciously L. Mortimer Fortesque, Chairman Husbands Union Committee of Welcome to Charles A. Levine, who brevetted him for his high courage and reckless daring—for making the trip without consulting his wife.

But it must be remembered that Lindbergh was the idol of the period, and Levine's exploit had tended somewhat to cast a shadow upon that hero's earlier deed. The populace would not have been very pleased, even in the olden times, if after the line of march celebrating the latest triumph of St. George, there had followed some country bumpkin unconcernedly dragging a second dragon. The presumptuous varlet—stone him!

It must be admitted, however, that Levine's conduct toward friend and foe was not what might be called conciliatory. Tact was never his prime virtue.

"Lindbergh had all the luck," he told the first reporters in Germany, and some have seen something less than the perfect tribute of one sportsman to another in the fact that he named his dog "We." For a little man he was uncommonly militant, bristling at the least touch. In his quarrel with Bertaud he was utterly uncompromising, and his remark on closing the discussion was not of the sort usually issued for publication.

"So far as Bertaud's ability as navigator is concerned, I congratulate him on his prowess to land with such glowing success in the newspapers," he said. And in answer to the news that the Government might effect a compromise of $300,000 in its suit against him: "I intend to bring suit against the Government for twice that amount."

He had two fist fights in Paris because his courage was questioned, and invited reporters to his rooms to give testimony that if anyone bore the marks of the encounters it was not he. "I used to be a boxer," he explained proudly.

Even the Yiddish press grew uneasy as reports began to filter into this country of his quarrels and adventures in Europe. Not even to members of his own race did he make concessions, and it must be admitted they began to regard him with suspicion. What sort of a Jew is this? In Warsaw he declined to meet the Jewish pressmen or mingle with any Jews. (Just the same the Polish press had to be warned by the Government not to abuse him as a Jew—was he not an American?) Even his own people began to be rather dubious as to whether his exploits reflected entirely to the credit of the Jewish people.

There was some haste, therefore, on the part of the American press to explain that, while Levine might approach Lindbergh in daring (and Levine was something of an amateur in the hero business), yet he was far deficient in certain moral qualities, and certainly a less outstanding personality.

As a matter of fact, it is perhaps in the last that Levine chiefly outshines his Nordic rival. For some tastes, let it be whispered, Lindbergh is too much the glorified Boy Scout, which is to say he is loyal, brave, trustworthy, dignified and public-spirited, if not always cheerful. Levine, on the other hand, is a true individualist, who gives not a rap for his foes and critics, who drives hell-bent ahead, and leaves his friends to do the explaining behind. What if he is vain glorious and boastful? Who will not say with Bill Nye: "I luv a rooster becaws he crows and becaws he has claws to back up his crow with"?

Those who love him cherish particularly that rotogravure photograph of all the eighteen or more trans-Atlantic flyers, taken beside the Nation's Chief before the White House. On this picture Levine sticks out, as the common expression goes, like a boil. While all the other seventeen or more flyers are gazing obediently at President Coolidge, Levine is perversely staring in the opposite direction. He is the shortest person present, counting even Ruth Elder, and it looks suspiciously as if he were standing on his toes.

But enough of weary comparisons; enough of apologia and analysis. Let the exploits of this remarkable young man—why is one surprised to find that he is not middle-aged but thirty?—speak for themselves. Let us turn back to the files of the newspapers where they are enduringly inscribed.

Even to the story of the flight itself as Chamberlin tells it for the New York Herald-Tribune. Scene: mid-air; the cockpit of the "Columbia." Characters: Clarence Chamberlin, pilot; Charles Levine, passenger. To look at them you would think the one is a peppery business man taking a ride in a taxi, of which the other is the driver. So it is no surprise to discover them arguing.

There is plenty to argue about. Chamberlin has announced that the gasoline supply will not last; Levine has discovered that the oars for the collapsible rubber boat had been left behind. Moreover, the indicator to the electric compass has broken. All of which Chamberlin considers more than ample reasons for turning back. "What," Chamberlin asks Levine, "do you wish to do about it?" "I'd rather be buried in Davy Jones' locker than face that newspaper gang in New York," Levine says with vehemence.

And all the way over Levine worries because he has the payroll of his company in his pocket, having absent mindedly forgotten to leave it behind. "It would be a shame to drop into the Atlantic with all that money in my pocket," he observes.

Even more exquisite is the "real inside" story of how they missed Berlin.

For miss it they did. Not theirs the swift unerring flight of Lindbergh, who landed in Paris as if drawn to the spot by some magnetic influence. In somewhat less precise fashion did Chamberlin and Levine reach their goal—or rather one of their goals, for when they left New York they were rather vague as to whether their destination was Berlin, Paris or Rome.

"When we got over Essen," says Chamberlin, "I thought we were over that town, but Charlie thought we were over Bremen. He said he had been there. I had never been to Essen. When Charlie was resting, I would fly in the direction I thought Berlin lay from Essen, but when he relieved me as pilot, he would fly in the direction he thought Berlin lay from Bremen."

They landed first in Eisleben, 105 miles west of Berlin. As a bit of aerial navigation, their trip left something to be desired; but they broke the record for the trans Atlantic flight. It was inevitable that Levine, missing one mark, should hit one as great. He is a Litvak.

Leaving Eisleben for Berlin, they blundered again, were lost in fog, and suffered a forced landing in a marshy field at Klinge, 70 miles southeast of Berlin, where a good crowd of citizens waited to welcome them, grew tired and went home cursing the Jews. . . .

Despite their little difficulties on this crazy voyage and later, the good-natured Chamberlin seems to have been the only man to properly appreciate Levine. To this day they appear on excellent terms with each other, and they were both more or less in high good humour while they toured Germany. Not until they reached Paris did they sever relations, and Chamberlin, in addition to establishing the world's long distance flight record, also has the more rare distinction of being the only pilot hired by Levine who was able to complete the contract. To the very end Chamberlin insisted loyally that the only point of difference between them was that, "I want to go back by boat; he wants to go back by plane. I am going back by boat; he is going back by plane. So everybody is happy."

A slight unpleasantness did arise, however, from Levine's unhappy challenge to Commander Byrd, who had by this time reached Paris. Failing to appreciate the serious scientific and diplomatic purposes underlying all trans-Atlantic flights, Levine suggested that they race back home. Ignorant Litvak that he was, he thought flying was some sort of a game, which he had just discovered he played as well as any.

Dismayed at this breach in the ethics of transoceanic flying, Chamberlin hastily denied all responsibility for the cable that contained the challenge. Levine had, as a matter of fact, signed for both. Levine, snubbed again, said little or nothing.

In Paris, after the restraining hand of Chamberlin was removed, Levine, with the best intentions, committed an even more serious breach of etiquette. He had learned his lesson that flying was not sport, but statesmanship. Why, then, could he not become an ambassador of good will, like Lindbergh? It must have appeared to him a particularly tactful gesture to suggest that a French pilot take him back home. He chose the Frenchman Drouhin.

But, incomprehensibly, the French chose to become incensed. The reasons assigned were that Drouhin was the only French aviator whose preparations for an Atlantic flight were so far advanced as to justify the hope a start might be made that year. And if Drouhin were to fly with an American, and in an American plane, the glory of the achievement would not be 100 per cent. French.

Somehow Levine received a greater share of the abuse than did the Frenchman who had consented to the arrangement. Amiably Levine offered to make the flight in a French plane, which offer was rejected. Bewildered as he must have been at the sudden storm, as usual he gave no apologies, and proceeded stubbornly with the work of preparing for the flight.

Before long, however, he was in serious quarrel with Drouhin over the terms of their contract. In characteristic fashion, Levine began making overtures to English pilots. Drouhin got wind of the scheme to supplant him, and there ensued, as the Herald-Tribune put it, "an argument as stormy as one between two persons not speaking the same language could be." Drouhin threatened an injunction, and Levine retorted by attempting to remove the motors from his plane. The Frenchman countered by placing his friends on guard. It was a merry warfare, and on one occasion blows were passed between Levine and the English speaking interpreter-friend of Drouhin, a man who towered a foot above the testy little Jewish business man.

Apparently some sort of reconciliation

yielded—a strange act for him—was all eagerness to be off.

Weather and engine trouble, however, intervened, and Levine became entirely unmanageable. He began to fuss around the equally nervous Frenchman, and was only silenced when the Frenchman dramatically offered his revolver as a better means of committing suicide than Officials of companies not so approved, and officials of syndicates and other unincorporated organizations, will apply for individual registration. The fee in all Form B applications is $25.

C. SALESMEN, whether representing general brokers or organizations selling securities of their own issue will apply for registration Form C. All salesmen must be registered individually before dealing in securities. The fee for salesmen whose employer is registered is $5, otherwise $25. Salesmen having no employer must register as brokers, fee $25.

OTHER EMPLOYEES not usually dealing in securities may be temporarily exempted from registration either as a class or individually. Thus, accountants, clerks, telephone girls, typists and the like need not be registered unless the Registrar requires, even although they may take an occasional order or otherwise do some act in furtherance of a transaction. Applicants will state what classes of employees they desire to have exempted, or may name individuals, describing their duties.

Weather and engine trouble, however, intervened, and Levine became entirely unmanageable. He began to fuss around the equally nervous Frenchman, and was only silenced when the Frenchman dramatically offered his revolver as a better means of committing suicide than the proposed flight to New York. Levine could not be contained for long, however. Soon he was negotiating with English pilots for a second time, making several flying trips to London, and conferring with Captain Courtney, Hinchliffe and others. The canny Drouhin again stationed his friends to guard the plane.

On August 29, after a month of such tactics, Levine engineered the coup for which he should be remembered long after his flight to Germany is forgotten. He stole his plane from under the noses of the guards at Le Bourget airdrome; and, making his first solo flight, crossed the channel to land in Croydon, England. And in bringing the plane to earth on his first attempt as pilot, he gave the veteran pilots and officials of the British flying field, said the New York Times, "an exhibition of flying they never saw equalled for craziness."

The officials had been warned of his coming, read the dispatch; and knowing he was an amateur flyer, they had summoned all emergency apparatus to be in readiness.

"Every attache of the great commercial flying area rushed to the field when the siren hooted that the American had been sighted. It was a busy hour, passenger planes arriving, and others departing over Europe's numerous air routes, and the whole place was fidgeting."

Levine was flying low and the officials watched breathlessly. "He had a runway about a half a mile across the airdrome, but was coming so fast he did not approach the ground until he had traversed almost half the distance towards the field's northern end. The officials groaned. An ambulance and a fire engine, which were held in readiness at the edge of the field, started to move slowly towards the north center, where they were expecting the wild pilot to crash, and the plane to crumple and burst into flames.

"No such thing happened. Levine suddenly seemed to realize that a landing was not likely to be gentle at such a rate, and started skyward like a rocket. There was where the miracle came in. Levine, ignoring all the first rules of piloting and practically at the point of losing all his flying speed, tried to make a climbing turn manoeuvre which has caused more deaths than almost any other from loss of flying headway when near the ground.

"One wing of the machine dropped until it seemed certain it would hit the ground. Then somehow or other the machine started upward.

"A veteran channel pilot swore softly. 'It takes a jolly good pilot to do that,' he added.

"'It's the engine, the engine,' muttered another at his side.

"Whatever it was, good luck or good engine (or God taking care of one of his Chosen), it carried Levine at a crazy angle almost to the roof of an outbuilding, which he unbelievably cleared, and then upward and away from the spectators. . . .

"Down to the southern end of the field he turned, and tried it again, but again too fast, and at too steep an angle. Ambulance and fire engines were now rushing madly back, but Leveine was away again.

"Pilot Smith of a local air taxi company then leaped into the breach. He took up a small Avro plane to show Levine how the landing was done. Levine says he didn't see the Avro. But as soon as the latter landed, Levine, following at a distance, tried again. The Avro, rolling on the ground, turned out of his path, and scuttled off sideways towards the distant hangars like a scared rabbit scooting for shelter before a pouncing hawk. Levine's plane pounced, but was not flying so fast as before and was going flatter. It bounded, according to witnesses, between twenty and thirty feet in the air, fluttered, wobbled, hit the ground and bounced again, but not so high, and finally rolled a short distance bumpingly and stopped.

"The officials, from being scared, turned wrathful, though relieved. They rushed forward only to meet a hatless civilian-clad pilot who was the least shaken man in the airdrome.

"'Oh, hello,' said Levine as they congratulated him on his landing. He was rubbing his chin and grinning. 'You know I think I need a shave. I didn't really know I was coming until I almost started.'"

So ends the account in the Times of this unparalleled flight. Levine was rushed to the quarters of the Air Ministry where, after the excitement had somewhat cooled, the officials began to enumerate the various rules, regulations, codes, enactments, ordinances and laws of the two countries that Levine had broken.

"By leaving France without proper clearance papers, he had broken the customs laws of both England and France.

"He had not observed the flying rules of Britain, which say that no plane shall be flown more than three miles from any airdrome by other than a licensed pilot. He had not made the proper circlings in the airfield."

There were other violations. What were rules and regulations to a man like Levine? "When a Litvak takes to flying" . . . there ought to be a proverb.

In England, Levine began to materialize his plans, and engaged Hinchliffe as his pilot. When the trans-Atlantic flight was given up because of the unfavourable weather reports, Levine conceived the idea of a non-stop flight to India instead. And engaged in a quarrel with his latest pilot.

This time he came off rather the worse. The flight had been postponed for several days because of rain, and when the anxious Hinchliffe finally summoned Levine to make ready to leave, the latter's ardor had apparently cooled. He sent back word that he did not consider the weather yet favourable. Hinchliffe, however, was of a different mettle from Levine's other pilots. In Hinchliffe, indeed, Levine finally met his match.

The angry pilot strode up to Levine's rooms and was for dragging him bodily to the field. Under the single and venomous eye of the one-eyed pilot Hinchliffe, Levine seems to have quailed. The Jewish Ulysses could do no more with this Cyclops than to explain, which he seems to have done satisfactorily, by admitting that it was the press of important business and not the weather that prevented him from flying that day. A week later they started, without the fuss and commotion that usually attended Levine's activities. The journey ended in Vienna, where because of a broken feed-pump they were forced to descend.

Here end Levine's adventures—except for one. He flew to Italy, and there he had an audience with the Pope.

Two appointments did that august personage make with the former dealer in steel pipes and plumbing [illegible]. On the first occasion, Levine was delayed so long at the Papal gates by people seeking autographs that the appointed time passed, and the gates clanged to. His Eminence was reported to be extremely angry, but diplomatic friends arranged another appointment, which Levine came within a half second of missing. He was just able to rush through the gates, clad in his plain business suit, as they were closing.

As the Papal major-domo escorted him to the door of the little throne room, and as he walked past the gravely saluting Swiss Guards, his uneasiness increased; and when he was finally ushered into the presence of the Pope, he was completely overawed.

"I was so impressed," said Levine afterwards, "that I couldn't say a single word. I felt as if I were in another world. I felt more celestial in the Vatican than when flying across the Atlantic, so high in the air."

Where was the gaunt astral shade of his paternal great-grandfather, the learned and pious Reb Moishe Levine of Vilna, as that world-famous great-grandson of his dropped to his knee and kissed the Pope's ring? Surely Charles was not wearing the talith which the Polish Jews had presented him as a talisman for his flight back when he kneeled and pressed his Jewish lips to the Papal seat, and received the Papal blessing for the safety of his future flights.

The next day the plane in which he and Hinchliffe were flying crashed to the ground.

LEAGUE TO COMBAT POGROMS

At a meeting in Paris, attended by almost 6,000 persons, a League to fight pogroms has been organized. M. Bernard Lecache said in his address that powerful foreign influences have been used to prevent the organization of the League and that a number of French Jews also opposed the movement, because they were afraid that the latent anti-semitism in France might be aroused by such protests. N. Henri Torres, the attorney who defended Schwartzbard, spoke very vehemently against the Governments that allow hatred and discrimination to exist in the Universities. He said: "The best professors are excluded because they are liberals. Almost the entire French press has been bought by Rumanian institutions. Rumania, which has not enough money to buy a milligramme of radium, spent 25,000 francs on every journalist who came to Rumania. The complaint is made that the protest movement against the pogroms will not do any good to the Jews of Rumania, but we know the Rumanian character, and must influence our Government to influence Rumania."

It was said that Professor Albert Einstein, Mr. H. G. Wells, Professor Seigmund Freud and other outstanding personalities in Europe, have joined the League.

C. W. LINDSAY & CO., LTD., SHOWING PROGRESS

A dividend at the rate of 6½ per cent. per annum on the preferred stock for the quarter ending May 31, 1928, has been declared by C. W. Lindsay & Co., Limited. This is the first dividend paid by this company following the purchase of its securities by Johnston and Ward and their sale to the investing public.

The dividend is payable to shareholders of record May 19, 1928.

Officers of the company report excellent progress in all their stores, which are situated in nine different centres in eastern Ontario and Quebec. Sales for April of this year showed an increase of approximately 20 per cent. over the same month last year. This follows similar increases in February and March over the same months of last year.

The West Central Section is now practically the West Central Liberal Jewish Congregation of London. Only the formal reconstitution is necessary before the new congregation starts its life. It is the third Liberal congregation formed in the British capital in recent

The Security Frauds Prevention Act

The Government are anxious in bringing into force The Security Frauds Prevention Act, 1928, to do everything possible to protect the average citizen when he proceeds to buy securities, whether stock or bonds or other evidence of participation.

In many of the American states and the western provinces, there has been an attempt made to pass on all securities that are sold. This form of legislation has been commonly called "blue sky."

The legislation which is now being brought into force in Ontario is not "blue sky" legislation. It does not attempt to regulate the security, but it does attempt to regulate the broker or the salesman, no matter what type of security he is selling.

Misrepresentations of fact can be made by the salesman, even if he is selling a good stock. It is probable that most of the misrepresentations, however, are made when the salesman is trying to dispose of a poor stock or bond.

In order, therefore, to be in a position to regulate the broker or the salesman who does business in Ontario, the new legislation provides for registration with the Registrar, Lieut.-Col. W. W. Denison at the Parliament Buildings. This will provide the Department with all the necessary data and enable them to keep in touch with the business interests of the province, should complaints from time to time be made concerning flotations and sales of stock.

In connection with the registration of brokers and salesmen, it must be remembered that the sound business interests of the country are entitled to protection.

The administration of this Act will be carried out, keeping in mind not only the protection of the man who buys, but the protection of the man who is in business and who sells. The Government is anxious to enable business men engaged in the flotation of stocks and in the organization of companies to carry on in a way that will make their enterprises successful. There will, therefore, be two things uppermost in our minds, viz.: (a) the protection of the buyer and (b) the protection of the seller.

If these two things are kept in mind, then ninety-nine per cent. of our population should be interested in making this province an unsafe place for those who are advancing poor business projects or who are trying to misrepresent their project and defraud the public. In other words, this legislation is aimed at the fraudulent promoter and the fly-by-night salesman.

All good development promotions, whether general business or mining, can stand publicity. In other words, the public are entitled to accurate information. It is not in the interests of the development of Ontario to have information withheld when the public are invited to put up their money. The average man in this province wants a run for his money. He does not always expect to be successful. If his money is well spent, and if it actually goes into the project, then, even if there is a loss, he will have no complaint, but he does not like to find out that it has mostly gone for promotion. This Act is intended to encourage legitimate development, and we believe it will have a tremendously beneficial effect in the development of Northern Ontario and of our tremendous wealth.

With the firm belief that any good project can stand publicity and that any promoter should be pleased to file accurate information with the Department, the law now provides that all companies, no matter where incorporated, must file information. These forms really take the place of the old prospectus clauses in The Companies Act.

It is the intention of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies to co-operate in every way with the business men of this province in the daily press of the province, giving out such detailed information as may be necessary to facilitate the working out of the administrative policy.

We ask the business interests of the country and the public generally to exercise patience, as the Act is being brought into force.

It takes some little time to develop a proper personnel and to get everything to full capacity. This can be better done if there is general co-operation.

to put forward their projects in a way that will give the public information and increase the probability of success.

In dealing with mining companies, those administering the Act will have the active co-operation of the Hon. Chas. McCrea, Minister of Mines. They will be able to rely on information that the Mines Department has about the various mining areas and property in Northern Ontario. This will make it advisable for promoters to give accurate data about their mining prospects, as we can very readily have this data checked up if false representations are made.

The fact that Ontario is trying to protect its own people will make foreigners who have money to invest in Canadian development feel that they have some protection when they come here. They will be encouraged to invest their money in Ontario securities and will be more disposed to put their money into development. We are anxious to reassure them that, if they want to develop mines or timber or any of our latent resources, they will have the co-operation of the Government and we will try and protect them by seeing as far as possible that the money actually goes for development.

When the Government made up its mind to bring in this legislation, consultations were held with representatives of the Toronto Stock Exchange, the Standard Mining Exchange, the Investment Bankers, and Brokers, the Board of Trade, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the bankers, the insurance companies, business men generally, etc., etc., with the idea of getting their reaction on whether it would affect general business if legislation of this kind was enacted. They were unanimous in their assurance to the Government that it would help business generally, that it would stabilize promotions and add to the development of the north country. They pointed out that Ontario is now a wealthy community and that people will invest their money if they feel that it is going into good hands and that companies are properly financed and regulated.

Therefore, in carrying out the new legislation providing for registration of brokers and salesmen and the filing the necessary information under The Companies Information Act, this Department has had the co-operation of all these business interests.

We were pleased to have the co-operation of the exchanges in Ontario.

When a brokerage firm has a seat on one of the exchanges worth around $100,000, they are not anxious to do anything to jeopardize that asset. They are likely to try and do business on a basis that will appeal to the public. If the public feel that there is a check on brokers and salesmen and that all brokers, good and bad, must be prepared to give accurate information to the public when they sell a stock, then the public will be better assured that they are being treated fairly. This in the end must redound to the credit of our stock exchanges. It will succeed in eliminating those who are not prepared to deal fairly with the public and who prey on the cupidity of people who want to get rich quick or who take away money from widows and orphans.

The Government legislation has had the very widest support of the press in Ontario. In fact, they have been almost unanimous in approving what has been done. That is a most important factor in bringing this legislation into effect.

If the business interests of the country and the press are unanimous, then along with a fair administration of the Act we should be able to deal with the people who set out deliberately to defraud the public, probably less than one per cent.

In order to make sure that the public understand what this legislation means and what brokers have to do, it is proposed to insert two advertisements

Trotzky, in the first coalition cabinet, as representative of the socialist-revolutionist party. His speech dealt with domestic problems of Russia, and was in the nature of a partizan tirade against the present government. The Yiddish crowd listened to a Russian political harangue in Yiddish.

And let it be added that this Dr. Steinberg who occupied the very high position in the Russian government is the son of a rabbi, and a nephew of the famous Hebrew literary critic, "Ba'al Machshoveth." At one time he was vice-president of the Hebrew Culture League ("Tarbuth") in Russia. He is a religious Jew, observing strictly the Jewish dietary laws. He is an anti-Zionist. Recently he won the first prize for writing in German the best play in a dramatic competition in Germany. He is only thirty-nine years old.

Visualize the setting, and the figure in the foreground —truly a bizarre scene.

This week there comes to its close the case of David Gordon, nineteen-year-old poet of the University of Wisconsin, who was arrested in New York and served part of an indeterminate sentence in the reformatory for writing an obscene poem, "America," published in the "Daily Worker." Gordon, who was in jail for a number of weeks, will be on parole for thirty-five weeks instead of in prison for three years, and he is going back to the University of Wisconsin to be a "nize baby." The general feeling seems to have slid from the peak of fear about the safety of American institutions down to the more earthly, prosaic opinion that if young Gordon eats plenty of roughage and gets out in the air for a while every day he will develop all right and the United States will be no nearer Communism than it is to-day.

Gordon had a rough time of it from the moment of his arrest. Enough letters have been written to the newspapers about him, covering every phase of the situation, to fill a small volume. The patriots, the radicals, lawyers and officials and others, wrote what should be done with or for Gordon for writing a poem in which America, its culture and economic system, was likened to a pestilential place and in which a synonym for harlot was used. What must have hurt his feelings most was the agreement among critics that the poem, while only mildly obscene, was such a rotten poem from a literary standpoint. The world was divided into people who thought he should go to prison and people who thought it would be enough to wash his mouth out with soap and give him a lecture, but both patriots and radicals could come together in a hearty embrace and agree that if that was a poem, well, what is poetry coming to?

Then there were the judges. Faced by members of various patriotic organizations come to protect the country and see that it got a square deal against nineteen-year-old Gordon, the judges appeared to lose all humour and all sense to say nothing of dignity and manners. Gordon's having won a scholarship in the University of Wisconsin before sentence was imposed made him more rabid in their eyes. Part of the court proceedings printed in the "New York World" showed that the three judges at his trial were prejudiced. It was stressed that Gordon had come from Russia and had even changed his name from Goronefsky to Gordon! Although Gordon is a minor, they imposed sentence of at most three years in the reformatory. The past few weeks his companions have been boys convicted of stealing less than $50 or taking small valuables from unlocked houses, and here he has been held incommunicado, only his family and lawyers being allowed to see him.

The wide appeal for clemency to Gordon, which was fostered by the "New York World," was most interesting for the variety of people it brought up in arms together. There was such a foolish gap between the decision of the judges and public sense of justice. And it was so patent that it was not the four lines of obscenity which constituted Gordon's real offence, but his lack of patriotism from the viewpoint of the judges. They didn't like him, they thought he was undesirable and past redemption, and they wanted him in jail for a good long while. Educators objected to this style of improvement, radicals objected because of the political aspects of the case, Jews objected because they considered it an attack upon the Jewish people, the University of Wisconsin, student and faculty, objected overwhelmingly, the country was full of objection in which, luckily, the newspapers took part or allowed space for letters.

In making the decision to release Gordon, after the Court of Appeals had refused a rehearing of the case, the Parole Commissioner said: "To take drastic action against Gordon would, in our opinion, only serve to add further to his already exaggerated self-esteem and to make a martyr of an immature and inconsequential youth who has been guilty of writing a very bad and vulgar piece of 'poetry.' The commission, therefore, has decided to release Gordon, he having already served thirty-five days. A condition of his release will be that a recurrence of his offense will mean more drastic action." This, of course, is charged with "insults," but the young poet should bear in mind from his very recent early boyhood that "sticks and stones may break my bones, but bad names never hurt me." Even the Parole Commissioner thinks the poem was no poem, just very bad and vulgar.

Anyway, Gordon has been called brilliant by a professor or two. Here's hoping he has enough common sense to know when he's well off. Let him talk fluently and loudly in red, red words to all those who do not run in the opposite direction from the particular kind of boredom which callow Communists create. He may be extremely vermilion now and imprisonment might have made him want to break down all organized society, with bombs, maybe. But he is not going to prison and other youths have spoken vengefully of governments and banded themselves together with more youths who spoke vengefully of governments and still they have become pants manufacturers in time and learned how to lower wages and drive shiny, big cars. If this humdrum fate of the bourgeoisie ever envelops Gordon, he can blame it on the fact that New York justice didn't shrivel in May, 1928, and that there were once some composed people who could yawn and say: "Aw, why bring that up?" f.f.c.

The Neglected Jews

By M. Frank

In discussing Jewish education we usually speak of the younger child on whom we pin our fondest hopes for the preservation and perpetuation of Judaism in this country. We entertain very slight hopes for the adult except as an agent of maintaining and financing Jewish education. So we do not really speak of the adult—we speak at him.

The custom of the Jewish masses in this country falls in line with this point of view. The average Jewish parent gives or attempts to give his child a Jewish education between the ages of six and thirteen by sending him to a Hebrew school for eight or ten hours a week. The modern Hebrew school does not create this habit. It takes the habit for granted and seeks to utilize it to the better advantage of the child. It gives the child a better Jewish education, more systematic and more adapted to his nature, it gives him more atmosphere in the school, treats him better and so on.

But now what will happen to those children who graduate the elementary course of a Hebrew school? The vast majority of them will cease their Jewish education at that point. A minority will continue in the post-elementary course provided by the Hebrew school. This minority will get a fine Jewish schooling, and in time be able to exercise an influence over the rest of the community, but they will of necessity remain in a minority.

What of the average boy or girl who attends High School? They find that their High School work does not permit them to attend Hebrew school for the same amount of time that they did before and their parents are not in a habit of urging them to go to Hebrew school at this age. Yet the adolescent child possesses characteristics which enable him to get certain aspects of Jewish culture better than the smaller child or the adult. The adolescent will not acquire fluency and naturalness in Hebrew as readily as a small child. But he will appreciate the lofty passages in the Prophets and will be amenable to their influence much quicker than the pre-adolescent. A small child can be taught the facts and stories of Jewish History, but an adolescent with his awakening mental powers can understand the course of history, can grasp its pathos, its grandiose tragedy and its universal significance and its connection with the whole history of mankind. A small child can be told about Jewish customs, can be told about the Chalutzim, about the work of upbuilding Palestine, but only the adolescent can appreciate these things fully. A course in the appreciation of present Jewish life cannot even be attempted with small children. Not only will the average adolescent appreciate these things better than the average child, but he will also react to them emotionally more readily than either the child or the adult. The average adolescent is also more mentally alert than the average adult.

There have been various agencies for the education of the youth, notably Young Judaea. But young Judaea has at best succeeded in educating the emotions and has given its adherents only as much substantial knowledge as it is absolutely essential for the education of the emotions. This is obviously insufficient, important as Young Judaea is as a supplementary Educational Factor.

A new agency must be established for the Education of the Adolescent in Jewish things. It should give the Jewish youth a systematic course in Jewish subjects for at least four or five hours per week. Such an agency would need trained teachers, systematic supervision, a more or less definite curriculum.

Such a curriculum would have to take in mind two classes of pupils. Those who are graduates of an elementary Hebrew school and can follow all, or most of their Jewish studies in Hebrew and those who have no adequate preparation in Hebrew and would have to pursue their studies in English with Hebrew being merely one of the subjects.

The agency that would organize and control such school (let us call it Extension High School) would be faced with a task of considerable magnitude: it would have to create a widespread custom of giving Jewish boys and girls of High School age a regular and systematic Jewish education. It would have to devise ways and means of approaching the parents and the prospective pupils. It would have to enlist the co-operation of various bodies who have an approach to the youth. By all means the outline of a curriculum is the easiest part in the task of creating an Extension Jewish High School.

The acolescent who has had no Jewish schooling must be given some: the one who has received a background in Hebrew must be taught to appreciate that background and to increase his store of Jewish knowledge. People who take Jewish culture seriously and who have the approach to the young element ought to consider this matter.

MAGISTRATE GIVES MONEY IN MEMORY OF M. M. COHEN

Following is a letter to Ralph Raphael, president of the Jewish Big Brothers, from Magistrate Alan Coatsworth:

"Three years ago I paid several visits to the B'Nai Brith Camp at Long Branch to see two young friends, and while there I heard from the camp director, Mr. Williams, something of the work of the late Moses M. Cohen and of his deep interest in boys. He was staying at the time at a farm house nearby, but he was to be seen always about the camp taking an active interest and a keen delight in all its activities. His heart was in the welfare and happiness of that gang of lads whom individually he must have loved with a deep and tender affection. Surely one could not do a nobler work than that of taking boys in the rough, some having had little enough opportunity, and turning them into fine, upstanding citizens, boys of strong Jewish character, ready to play a man's part in the battle of life. Thanks to the big heart of Moses Cohen, many a boy was equipped with health and character to win a fight in which otherwise the odds might have been against him. It was an inspiration to me to see the work of this great-souled man who loved boys and gave of himself and of his means without stint for their welfare. It may be that some who were associated with Mr. Cohen in boys' work are planning something of a memorial nature, perhaps some improvements to the camp at Keswick, with which his name might be permanently connected. In the hope that a plan of this nature may take definite shape, I send you herewith $200, which I beg of you to accept, to help perpetuate the work which Moses Cohen loved. There are no strings to this contribution, except that I wish it to be used for a capital expenditure and not for any operating outlay."

Variable Spring Weather Brings Urgent Need for ICE

THESE variable spring days—temperature up one day and down the next—greatly affect the "keeping qualities" of food. Milk, meat, fish, etc., deteriorate quickly if left unprotected by ice.

Food should be placed in a well iced refrigerator immediately upon delivery, and kept there, at an even cold, until used. Keep the ice chamber well filled.

Ice is plentiful. It is convenient. It is cheap. Everybody can enjoy the blessings of ice. It costs but a few cents a day.

HE SHOULD HAVE KNOWN BY THAT TIME

Nathan and his sweetheart, Rosie, were going to the theatre that night. He sat in the parlour of her home waiting while she was upstairs dressing. It seemed to be taking her an unusually long time to get ready, and so he called out several times, "Please hurry, Rosie, or we will be late for the show."

This irritated her, and she exclaimed: "You certainly are annoying. Haven't I been telling you for more than an hour that I'll be ready in five minutes."

LOEW'S

One of the best small casts of the season has been employed in the making of "Under the Black Eagle," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's thrilling romantic drama coming soon to Loew's Theatre.

Ralph Forbes, who is featured in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's northern film epic, "The Trail of '98," directed by Clarence Brown, and who appeared opposite Lillian Gish in "The Enemy" and with Lon Chaney in "Mr. Wu," has the leading male role.

Marceline Day, who played opposite Lon Chaney in "The Hypnotist" and "The Big City," has the featured feminine role while the picture serves as the initial starring vehicle of Flash, a remarkably intelligent police dog now being introduced to the screen by Harry Rapf, who first presented such canine stars as Peter the Great and Rin-Tin-Tin.

Bert Roach, star of "Excuse Me" and one of the principals in King Vidor's twelve-reel special production, "The Crowd," has the leading comedy role, while Marc MacDermott, William Fairbanks and other well-known screen players are seen in prominent parts.

An additional screen attraction is the latest "Our Gang" comedy, with the [illegible]
